of Science Main menu Category Archives: Vents The great conundrum concerning skyscrapers isn't whether they can be built, but why so many of them aren't built. "The biggest failure in the world's modernist architecture is its failure to realize that there are many more atoms in a million degree celsius than in a million degree cold — a million degree celsius — so it is going to burn." With oil prices at $100 a barrel, New York City is defying conventional wisdom to announce with relish that it will complete two more hospitals. The first, to start this January at Lenox Hill Hospital on the Upper East Side, will cost $13.5 million. The second, due soon in Jamaica, Queens, will cost another $138 million. The city will also invest $88.5 million in outpatient surgical centers and $3.5 million in new underground parking to care for patients. Combined, the three three projects are expected to cost nearly $450 million — a drop in the bucket compared with the $1 billion the city has spent on hospitals over the last decade. "It's a pretty powerful statement," said David Friedman, who leads the city's hospital system and is a longtime proponent of increased hospital capacity. "A lot of time and work have gone into this. We think it's a very good investment." But the city shouldn't be foolish enough to attempt to stretch to capacity. It will suffer the fate of Sweden — once considered the world’s healthiest country, but now considered the world’s worst because it has built and is building too many hospitals and faces a sobering reality check: It has insufficient hospital capacity. This may surprise you, but there’s no reason we can’t build a device to explore the beauty of space. That’s the idea behind Mars One, the international Mars One company looking to get humans to Mars in the next decade or so. On Feb. 7, 2014, rocket ship will take off from Earth and head toward the Red Planet. But a decade in the planning, the corporate assemblage aims to leave little room for error, like the year before the first lunar flyby. Prior to the decision to put a human on Mars, the company is already meeting to choose its hundreds of
