Julian Assange addresses attendees from the balcony of the Ecuadorian Embassy in London as an audience member looks on, May 16, 2019. WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange said on Monday that the real winner of the U.S. election was President Donald Trump, who in the end emerged as the more popular candidate. Assange said his organization has, up until now, taken pains to focus on the views of people who it considers to be marginalized or silenced. "As the election progresses and Trump keeps claiming victory, it is worth noting that none of the mass broadcast media, the body (politic), the analyst class or the establishment has given Trump any credit for the election," he said in a statement. Assange alleged that the operation and early fawning coverage from the mainstream U.S. media showed that "the decision makers and authorities of a powerful country favor a candidate who lacks any credible peer opposition." The WikiLeaks head did, however, mention the fact that

Hillary Clinton — Trump's opponent — claimed she lost the election because Russia had meddled in it, an assertion that's been widely discredited. "The real winner is a candidate of the U.S. establishment who received strong support for her claims she lost because Russia was in the election on her behalf, and some of it even came from the U.S. intelligence community," Assange said. Assange was invited to the front of London's Ecuadorian Embassy to address the crowd of supporters gathered on the balcony. The WikiLeaks founder said in recent weeks it had received thousands of messages of support and people from around the world asking about the possibility of being granted asylum. "They sent letters, they sent emails, they sent postcards and made calls, but they [the Embassy's authorities] have made no response," he said. The Ecuadorian government allowed Assange to remain inside the embassy since 2012, when he sought refuge from an extradition order from Sweden over a rape allegation. Ecuador's President Lenin Moreno on Thursday granted Assange political asylum, saying he believed the WikiLeaks founder was threatened in London.
