Breastfeeding is the leading cause of death for young infants in the United States. Based on evidence from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the American Academy of Pediatrics recommends that women with HIV initiate breastfeeding soon after delivery. The importance of this recommendation is underscored by the fact that breast milk is a key source of nutrients for the human infant. Current practices for preventing non-exclusive breastfeeding (EBF) among women with HIV in resource-poor countries pose a major threat to the health of these infants. Proving the feasibility of a novel milk bank use for HIV+ donors is a key objective of the proposed project. [unreadable] [unreadable] The proposed studies will identify how differences in the body's nutritional status may impact the level and composition of milk produced by lactating women with HIV. By developing a better understanding of the underlying physiological and systemic changes that are associated with HIV infection, we will evaluate the feasibility of establishing a milk bank protocol for donors with HIV, and identify milk factors that may improve the usefulness of milk for the infant.
