A convenient location, a relatively low cost, and economies of scale make for the grocery store store label that delivers a fast and easy turnover. Typically, products are received from a manufacturer and placed on racks or in a corner near shelves for display and sale. One or two large collapsible display-type carts may also be used to place attractive displays and to support items. Grocers are typically concerned with products that are on or off the shelves within a matter of hours or days. As such, they place little value on a slow change of inventory and will often sell off old items or shut down the pop-up prior to the end of its intended retail life. The operational costs incurred in running such displays are typically minimal but include the cost of signage and changing the end-use of the product upon expiration. The products are not stored to minimize waste or to help maximize shelf life.Q: document.getElementsByClassName returning "undefined" I have my html set up as follows, but the console logs "undefined" when I try to reference anything inside the selectedClass class.
